FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 18.

Escapade of an Earl's Son.

Early in the present theatrical season a new face appeared in the orchestra seats, allotted to the dramatic critic of the World, at the different places of amusement, and simultaneously the attention of those who took an interest in such matters was attracted to a series of articles in that journal-articles which, while departing from the conventional form of such contributions, yet displayed a nice and unbiased judgment, and were especially notable for the possession of what might be called the flavor of dilettantism. The owner of this face-and pen-was a young gentleman of aristocratic mien who, like the Lady Jane of the "Ingoldsby Legends," was "tall and slim," and who had, moreover, a silent partner in the person of a lady, as distinguished in appearance as himself. When it was asked who he was, the answer came that he was "a Mr. Monteressor, a Scotch gentleman of good family, whose taste for theatrical matters and desire to give his opinions the publicity of the prints, had led him to volunteer his services to the newspaper he represented and who, strange to relate, steadily refused all remuneration.

Time and the theatrical tide rolled on, and the young Scotchman and his fair companion still sat in judgment in the high places of the drama. Just as the season reached its last stage, taking on iris like hues, as the dolphin becomes more brilliant immediately before it dies, the Mont crossor disappeared from his accustomed haunts, and Metropolitan curiosity at once fixed upon him as "a mystery." The surmise proved, it is now said, to be correct in the light of elucida-tion, for it was discovered, rumor has it, that the volunteer critic of the World was no less a person than a son of Lord Airlie, a Scotch nobleman; that he had come to this country with £3,000, which he had religiously spent, and that accustomed to luxurious modes of life, he had contracted debts as a supplement to the exhausted £3,000, that had caused serious embarrassment to a naturally sensitive nature. On Saturday "Mr. Monteressor" returned to Europe by the steamship Oder, unaccompained however, by the lady who had shared his seats at the theater, and with whom a romance is said to be associated. The noble critic may and may not return, but his experience here this winter has certainly formed what theatrical managers would announce, in large type, as "an entirely novel-situation.—New York Graphic.
